Subject: Questions regarding Rosemont process

Margot,

As discussed over the phone, here are a few questions regarding the process related to the proposed Rosemont copper project. I apologize if any of my terminology is incorrect.

-The EPA has the ability to challenge the US Forestry Service's final EIS as being inadequate. What would be the process for doing this, and how long would the USFS have to respond and remedy the deficiencies?

-The EPA also has, in effect, a veto right with regard to the Army Corp of Engineers' issuance of a 404 CWA permit. What would be the process for the EPA to exercise this veto right, and what is the appeal process for either the Rosemont Project or the ACOE to appeal the EPA's determination?

-Under what circumstances can the EPA exercise its veto right regarding the 404 permit? Can it veto the determination for any reason, or is it limited to overruling the permit issuance based solely, for instance, on faulty methodology or inadequate analysis, for instance?

Thank you and have a great Thanksgiving.

Regards,

Nathan
